

2014 Regional Snapshot

How many Aboriginal people are involved in NRM?

The protection and management of natural resources have been traditional responsibilities of Aboriginal people for tens of thousands of years. Despite widespread changes to Australia over the last 200 years, healthy natural resources remain critical to the spiritual, social, cultural and economic wellbeing of Aboriginal people.

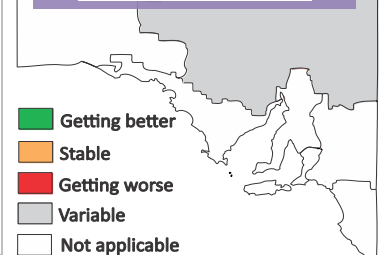

This report tracks Aboriginal involvement in natural resource management through participation in projects, boards, committees, workshops and employment with the Department of Environment, Water and Natural Resources (DEWNR).

The 2011 Australian Bureau of Statistics census indicates that over 1,000 Aboriginal people live in the SA Arid Lands NRM region – about 6.4 per cent of the population.

In South Australia, the unemployment rate of Aboriginal people was about three times higher than for non-Aboriginal people between 2005-11. The Government of South Australia aims to increase Aboriginal employment in all public sector agencies to at least 2 per cent across all levels. DEWNR has an additional target of at least 3 per cent.

Trend (2008-13)

Variable

In this NRM region, Aboriginal employment is increasing within DEWNR. More information is needed to report trends in Aboriginal participation in NRM.

From 2008-13, DEWNR exceeded the Aboriginal employment targets of 2 per cent (public sector target, graph on right) and 3 per cent (DEWNR target) with the South Australian Arid Lands NRM region.

In 2013, 8 Aboriginal people were employed by DEWNR (11 per cent of staff) in partnership with the SA Arid Lands NRM Board.

Where we are at (2013)

On track

Aboriginal employment within DEWNR is 11 per cent in this NRM region. More information is needed to report Aboriginal participation rates in NRM.

The knowledge of Aboriginal people guides natural resource management through their participation in boards, committees and workshops. The SA Arid Lands NRM Board has 1 member who is Aboriginal. Co-management boards and committees that manage natural resources are attended by 28 core members and 28 deputy members, all of whom are Aboriginal, and there is an Aboriginal member on all 6 district groups in the NRM region.

The collection of information on participation in NRM is not standardised and people's heritage is not always recorded, so the following summaries underestimate actual participation rates. In 2013, 44 Aboriginal people volunteered in field activities, supported by the NRM Board, DEWNR and the Australian Government. 14 Aboriginal people participated in resource management workshops and field days. In 2013, projects supported improvements to 4 properties managed by Aboriginal people in the NRM region.

The Australian Government's 2009 Invest Action Plan highlights that increasing Aboriginal employment and broader participation in the natural resource management sector requires long-term funding and support, particularly for career-path opportunities.

Reliability of information

Excellent for Aboriginal employment. Participation data are not standardised.
