SECTION ONE
PREFACE

The report of the Moonta Commercial Core Study has been divided into two sections to allow the ready dissemination of information. Section one contained herein provides an historical analysis of the study area, detailing settlement of Moonta, important periods of expansion and change and relating such patterns to the physical fabric of the town. In this way the importance of what remains in the township may be understood and appropriate measures considered to protect and enhance important elements.

Arising from this Appendix B provides an inventory of items which are considered sufficiently important to be afforded State Heritage protection. This constitutes one mechanism to protect valued elements and other complementary actions are discussed in Section two following an analysis of existing town function and trends of growth which can be expected to exert pressures on the area.

1.0 HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

1.1 The Discovery of Copper and the Founding of the Township (1860-1863)

The foundations of the mining industry on Yorke Peninsula and the creation of the township at Moonta grew out of adversity. During 1860 a widespread drought brought about a serious downturn in the South Australian economy; affecting the agricultural, pastoral and business communities.1 As had happened in South Australia twenty years before, the discovery of mineral wealth turned the tide of depression, reshaped the colony's future and brought about a new stage of the expansion of settlement. The Government in Adelaide greatly encouraged the quest for mineral wealth and supported the mining entrepreneurs by setting up towns and the systems of governmental order once the mines were established and proved successful.2 What the Government would not have realised was that they were linking the commercial and social life of the towns they set up to the ebb and flow of the life of the local mines.

The mineral discoveries which helped found Moonta were made on the land of a retired ships' captain, Walter Watson Hughes of whom one biographer wrote, "The narrative of his fortunes and reverses reads more like romance than reality".3 Hughes, when living at "The Peak", Watervale in 1857, had taken up a surrendered Crown Lease, number 147, from Robert Miller. The lease covered an area of some 104 square miles.4 Hughes' newly acquired property was called Walla-Waroo.

In late 1859 or early 1860, as drought covered the colony, James Boor, one of Hughes' shepherds made the first discovery of copper on Walla-Waroo. (This important discovery led to the establishment of the famed Wallaroo Mines and its adjoining of Kadina.) A year later speculative mania was rife in the mining industry. In the midst of daily accounts of the wealth that would be appropriated from the copper mines of Yorke Peninsula another of Hughes' shepherds, Patrick Michael Ryan travelling through a patch of thick scrub which the Aboriginals of the Narangga tribe called Moonta- Moonterra "came across a heap of copper ore that had been thrown out by a burrowing wombat". It is not surprising that, considering the intense mining speculation at the time and the rumours of instant wealth which abounded, this new discovery led to one of the most notable series of frauds, deceits and chicaneries ever perpetrated in South Australian history as Hughes and his partners sought to offset the rival claims of the Mills syndicate to the Moonta find.

5. James Boor's discovery of copper could have occurred in December 1859 or January 1860. Kadina 1872 - 1972 (Corporation of the Town of Kadina, Kadina 1972)p.1 states the date to be "17th December 1859", O'Neil, op cit p.47 gives 1860, O. Pryor, op cit p.25 does not give a date, F. Crowley in A Documentary History of Australia: Colonial Australia 1841-1874 (Nelson, West Melbourne, 1980) vol. 2 p.427, says 1859 and William Harcus, South Australia its history, resources and productions (Adelaide, Government Printer 1876) p.51 claims 1860. The only certain thing is that the South Australian Register on the 11 January 1860 stated that Hughes had applied for a mineral claim on his property. Pryor, op cit p.27. Ryan's find was first reported to the public in the South Australian Register, 13 June 1861.

6. The full story of the extent of "all the sharp practise and trickery" as Pryor calls it [op cit p.28] will probably never be known for the dispute ended in an out of court settlement between the company of Hughes, Elder and Stirling and the opposing Mills' syndicate. Much of the available evidence though, is outlined in the Report of the Select Committee 1863, and is outlined in the Observer 5 September 1863, supplement col.1.
Despite the machinations of the mine owners the mines themselves proved to be extraordinarily successful. By November 1861 there were reported to be about 80 people living at the Moonta Mines and local commercial entrepreneurs Hall and Osman had set up two stores to service the fledgling community. The heart of this commercial life was eventually to switch from the site of the mines to a grid-patterned township laid out a little to their west. The formation of such an ordered township was probably seen as necessary to bring a semblance of the order of British civilisation to the rough and ready atmosphere of the Mines.

The township of Moonta was surveyed in March 1863 and contained 336 allotments in a total area of 132 acres - there was also a substantial suburban section of 764 acres laid out at the same time. The streets of Moonta were all named after people connected in some way with the Government of the day, or with the discovery of the precious mineral wealth which had raised the flagging fortunes of South Australia's economy. So, for example, George Street was named after George Woodroffe Goyder, the then Surveyor-General. Again, Ellen Street was named after Ellen Smith, Goyder's sister-in-law, and yet again, Ryan Street was

7. South Australian Register, 21 November 1861.
8. I was unable to find any firm evidence of how the survey of the town came about or of how the town's site was chosen. It may well be that Hughes, Elder and Stirling (Moonta Mining Co. Directors) were concerned about the volatility of their miners and wanted the external signs of British order and government to help them keep the status quo at the Mines and protect their property. Vague references were picked up about Elder applying pressure for the formation of a town at Moonta. Pryor claims that the Directors of the Moonta Mining Co. were going to build a private town, but were forstalled by Government action in sending Goyder to select a town site. See O. Pryor, op cit p.149. Pryor gets his dates mixed here, he says that the Surveyor General was sent to select a town site at "the end of 1863", but the town was surveyed in March 1863.
9. PROSA, GRG 35/315, "Return showing Town and Suburban Lands surveyed since the year 1853 (1853-74)". The Hundred of Wallaroo in which Moonta is situated proclaimed on the 12 June 1862. See PROSA, GRG 35/584/115.
named after Patrick Ryan the shepherd who first discovered the rich copper lode on Hughes' pastoral lease.¹⁰

Even while the town was being surveyed, local magistrates were granting licences to shopkeepers at the Moonta Mines and incurring the wrath of tradesmen at Kadina who said that although they had intended to buy allotments in the new town at Moonta they would not do so, "until they get some assurance from the Government that those licences shall be withdrawn as soon as places of business are erected in the township."¹¹

The Government need not have been overly concerned with such vain threats for when, on 23 April 1863, the 336 townships allotments were offered for sale there was as the Adelaide press reported, "a very large attendance".¹² The almost manic speculation in the Mines adjacent to the town appeared to spill over into that first sale of allotments for they brought an extremely high average price. It is also noteworthy that most of the largest buyers of allotments - P.D. Prankerd (51), Green and Wadham (10), W. Rousevell (15), C.E. Tideman (36) - were either active Adelaide traders or known land speculators and developers, and were very much interested in keeping a speculative boom on the go.¹³

The Adelaide interests were not the only ones to invest in the township allotments and a sizeable local, Yorke Peninsula, faction were to provide the seeds from which Moonta commercial life would grow. James Counsell (5), Francis Michel, mason (2), John William Wilson, baker (2), David Brown, wheelwright (1), Peter and Henry Roach (1), Thomas R. Hart, storekeeper (1), John M. Egar, baker (1), William Thomas Foster, solicitor (1), Henry Caville, baker (1), Joshua Foster, minister (2), George and Alfred Restall, tinmen (1), Phillip G. Grundy, miner (1), all of Kadina, and Henry Martin, storekeeper (1), John Beer Jr., miner (1), James Wilton, miner (1), all of Moonta purchased allotments in the township.¹⁴

It was very soon clear that the hopes of both the Adelaide speculators and the local tradesmen were to be initially fulfilled. In an article written in 1940 Oswald Pryor reflected on those boom days and stated that, "The surveyed township of Moonta had become a prosperous business centre and allotments originally sold for 10 to 20 pounds which changed hands soon afterwards for 200 to 300 pounds."15

To analyse the diversity in trades at this early period and to recognise buildings which survive from the first year of settlement is a complex task. Newspapers are generally vague on the position of buildings and traders, and local oral tradition, is likewise, both general and unclear. Some of the available information is also a little ambiguous.16 A map of the town done in ink and water colour wash and dating from the first years of the town shows only a 'BANK' on allotment 131 - this was the first building for the Bank of South Australia. 'Weeks' Public House' on allotment 162, and a 'Church' on allotments 67-68.17 The map probably dates from 1864, for Pryor's account of the town in 1863, gained from a local correspondent for the Adelaide newspapers, although containing something of the initial structure of trades, lacks the Bank and the Church which the map mentions. Pryor states:

Two fine hotels had been built in George Street. One of these, Weeks's Prince of Wales Hotel, had a large bar

16. For example, although the official Department of Lands records show local tradespeople buying allotments at the first land sale on 23 April 1863 the account of the sale in the South Australian Register, 24 April 1863 does not mention the Roach brothers as purchasing their allotment, number 127, and ascribes the purchase to the spectacular P.D. Prankerd.

17. PROSA, GRG 59/47/13. The map most probably post dates the foundation stone laying of the Church of England, on the 21 September 1864, which it mentions as being on allotments 67-68. There is the possibility that the map was made earlier than the building of the Church and referred to the probable use of the site.
with cedar counters, a bar parlour, a private sitting room, a spacious hall, and a banqueting room... The other hotel Olifent's, nearer to the mines... Melvin's store, Wilson's bakery, and Bowman's butcher shop were the only other buildings worth mentioning.

Other reports sustain the existence of Weeks' Prince of Wales hotel and Olifent's Moonta Hotel by late September 1863. However, locals claim that Roach's built their butcher shop, now Waters', in that year and that Henry Martin's shop was also erected at that time. The Roachs and Martin certainly purchased allotments at the first sale on 23 April 1863, so this oral assertion gains credence, as their building might have occurred after the newspaper report which Pryor mentions. Two other shops, now demolished, Furner's on the corner of George and Ellen Streets and Michell's bakery, where Price's building is now situated, are also believed, locally, to have been built in 1863.

By the end of 1863 then, at least the rudiments of a commercial core were developing. Particularly on Ryan, George and Ellen Streets and Blanche Terrace the early service industries of hotels, butchers and bakers were springing up. The town, and its trade, were founded on the superstructure of mineral exploitation and the town was to act as the service centre and the centre of Governmental order for the Mines themselves. The naming of Moonta's streets again reflected this link between the Mines and the Adelaide based Government and its public service who were always anxious to boost the colony's economic progress. Just as the Government and its handling of the South Australian economy received an initial boost from the success of the Yorke Peninsula mines, so the town of Moonta prospered with the success of the local mines. However, from the time of this inaugural link between the mines and the township of Moonta and its tradespeople, the fortunes and fluctuations of the mines were mirrored in the upturns and downturns of local trade and commerce.

1.2 Consolidation and Incorporation (1864-1885)

By 1865 the structure of the trades and services at Moonta began to expand and diversify and the town might well have assumed the title of "Copperopolis" that a later writer gave it.22 A correspondent for the Register described the town's expansion.

If large and substantial buildings are a sign of the progress of a township, Moonta is making rapid strides. There are 7 general stores (3 building) 2 hotels (2 building) 2 bakers, 3 wine (and) spirit stores, 5 carpenters, 6 boot-makers, 3 hay and corn stores, 1 blacksmith, 1 plumber, 4 butchers, 2 watchmakers, 1 druggist, 1 hairdresser, 1 medico, 1 town crier and a great number of hawkers. The progress made in this township had never been exceeded in the colony.23

This account omitted to mention that as well as the variety of businesses a branch of the Bank of South Australia had opened its doors in George Street on 3 January 1865.24 Despite the trappings of success the traders and professionals of Moonta had already learnt the bleaker side of commercial and professional life in a mining service town.

In February 1864 the price of copper reached 99 pounds a ton and in March it was raised again to 105 pounds a ton.25 The Directors of the Moonta Mining Company very soon declared another dividend to their wealth-stunned shareholders of 5 pounds per share, and the face of mining enterprise beamed.26 However, within two days of this dividend declaration word reached Adelaide of a strike by Moonta miners.27 The miners stated that "they did not receive adequate remuneration for their labour" and objected to cruelty and ill treatment they received at the hand of the Moonta Mining Company's agent, Captain William Warmington and demanded fair hearing both at the mines and in Adelaide.28 It was not until June that the strike was settled and only August when the 28 year old Captain H.R. Hancock took over the reins of supervisor at the Moonta Mines.29

The strike must have frustrated the traders of the township whose livelihoods depended on the stability of mining operations. For example, one of the agreements that the striking miners decided upon was that to avoid trouble "none of the miners should during the strike frequent the public houses".30 It was not long before the press reiterated traders' apprehensions and noted that "the strike is causing intense excitement in the trading community of the Peninsula". The same correspondent also noted that the traders viewed the miners' claims with sympathy - higher wages meaning more to spend on foodstuffs and the other necessities of life - and claimed that the shopkeepers knew better than anybody else "how harsh and hardly [the miners] have been dealt with".31 At nearby Kadina trade was said to be "looking very dull indeed".32 Moonta townspeople learnt the lesson of this first strike well and little sympathy would henceforth move from the rectangular borders of the town terraces to the ramshackle boundaries of the mining leases.

By 1867 the trades and services of Moonta township were once again expanding. The town was described as possessing,

A flourishing mechanics Institute... The township has 5 hotels... The Prince of Wales, Royal Globe, Moonta, and Miner's Arms; also a tramway station where passengers and goods are booked for Wallaroo and Kadina, a post and money order office, telegraph station, court house, police station, Oddfellow's lodge (M.U.), Forester's Court, and branches of the South Australian and National banks, and the South Australian insurance companies... The places of worship in the town are in connection with the Church of England, Bible Christian and Baptist persuasions... The population of the township of Moonta mines, with smaller mines, numbers about 5,000 persons.33

The attitude of "progressive" settlement, so important to the achievement centred minds of mid-Victorian age colonists within the British Empire was being worked out at the township of Moonta.

Yet, although at times the face of "progress" stood untainted in the eyes of journalists and popular writers, Moonta traders were ever aware that if the price of copper or demand for it fell, or if miners' wages were lowered, or if the rich claims of mining entrepreneurs in other parts of Australia enticed miners away then their businesses must bear the brunt of such external factors. By 1868 that meant that approximately 90 men with business or professional interests in the town, and covering a wide range of 33 occupations as diverse as from corndealer to carpenter, from blacksmith to bailiff, and from butcher to bank manager, were dependent on the stability of the mines and their workforce.34

33 MLSA, Research Notes No. 197. The Research Notes cites the reference as being from R.P. Whitworth's, Baillere's South Australian Gazetteer, which was published in 1866.
34 J. Boothby, Adelaide Almanack, Town and Country Directory... 1868 (Adelaide, E.S. Wigg et al 1868) p. 58ff.
It was not long after the first edition of the Kadina and Wallaroo Times came out with its Moonta advertisements for R.V. Rodda, photographer and Edmund Pope, watchmaker, jeweller and repairer of musical instruments, that ideas of the staleness of the local Moonta economy began to come to the fore.

P.D. Prankerd, the land speculator who had bought so many allotments at the Moonta township sale in April 1863 was still trying to get rid of 49 of his original 51 allotment purchases. This may have been merely the device of a land shark trying to gain from a long-term holding or real estate. Yet, the real boom in township prices, as we saw earlier, was in the year following the first sale and the large print message below Prankerd's advertisement, "Long credit if required", would seem to indicate that he had been unable to realise the hoped-for gains.

It was only three weeks later that the local paper related, "Business here is very dull, miners are awaiting news from Queensland and don't feel inclined to invest more than necessity compels them to". To cap off this pessimism Moonta locals saw their once precious Institute become a thing of the past and turned into, as one writer put it, "a warehouse for the nonce", and saw one of their main retail streets, George Street, continually awash and made impassable by a river of salt water pumped from the mine shafts.

As if to emphasise that human history is neither static nor comprehensible this dullness in Moonta's economy heralded what was probably the township's most vibrant period of building, successful trade and commerce, and social viability. In March 1869, for example, the Adelaide press reported, > Building trade is very active at Moonta. Property has increased in value to the extent of 100 per cent, partly owing to the influx of Burra storekeepers who followed their customers, the miners.

One way of assessing the impact of this economic and social revival in Moonta is to investigate the effects of good and bad times on an individual trader. Thomas Berriman arrived at Moonta sometime in the late 1860s. In Boothby's 1868 Directory he is listed as a storekeeper, but by his own admission he only began his commercial life as a Moonta draper in June 1869.40 On the 18 June 1869 he wrote to a friend, "It is twelve days since I commenced and I have sold 745 pounds worth, tomorrow is big pay and I hope to take nearly a hundred more".41 This staggering amount taken into his till is only validated by the huge re-ordering he negotiates in future correspondence.42 A week later he wrote to a Mr. Lindram and offered to buy two allotments, numbers 2[5]4 and 253 in Caroline Street and within a month he again wrote to Lindram stating, "I was unable to call when in town... I shall however be down in a month when we can arrange about the allotment, in the meantime I will get the transfer papers ready so that you can sign them".43

On the same day he wrote to Lindram about finalising the sale of the allotments, Berriman confided to another correspondent that "Things with us here are a little quiet just now".44 However, noting Berriman's previous startling success this does not amount to a very negative view of things. It is in this same letter to this "Friend" that Berriman gives a wonderfully rich outline of how quickly Moonta was becoming a "commercial city".45

43 Ibid, T. Berriman to Lindram, 24 June 1869 and 19 July 1869. The number 254 is almost decipherable in the letter and could be 284. However, 254 is deemed the most likely the blocks being contiguous.
45 The quote comes from South Australian Register, 30 July 1869. The correspondent says almost exactly the same things as Berriman.
Moonta has been going ahead lately in the building trade. George Street, is now completely built upon, some time ago there were eight or nine shops to let and now they are all occupied and additional ones to the numbers of eight and nine more going up lately and they are all filled, so you see we have plenty of shops if that is any sign of good times. I am about to enlarge my place, I intend putting the present show room into the shop and having a new show room built at the back 21 foot long which will make the place altogether 61 feet long so that I shall have plenty of room then.46

The improvement in the life of Moonta's trade was staggering...

This rapid period of growth in the town, was further acted out by the formation of the town Corporation on 31 July 1872 and its being gazetted on the 1 August of the same year.47 Pryor clearly showed the extent of the town growth when he noted,

By 1870, the population of township and district had risen to 10,000, of whom 6,000 lived on the mining leases. All building blocks in the town suitable for business premises had been taken up, and a metalled road had been constructed along George Street, which had become the business centre...

By 1873 the town had eighty business premises, three banks, and five hotels, with another being erected at Moonta Bay, where a jetty had been built...

On May 24, 1875, by which time the greater Moonta area had a population of about twelve thousand, making it the largest South Australian centre of population outside Adelaide, the streets of the town, and many of the business premises, were lit by gas for the first time.48

Some of the buildings erected in the commercial core during the boom period were Moonta's third Institute in George Street erected on land donated by the M.P., David Bower in 1870; J.J. Broad's music shop in George Street (Harbison); N. Birk's chemist shop built in 1868 (Pascoe); the National Bank which was built in 1867; E.A. Beythein's chemist shop (Woodham Biggs); Marshall's Buildings; Thomas' grocers (Giesecke) all in George Street; the Bank of South Australia (the building was later taken over by the Union Bank); Moonta Medical Dispensary and a series of shops on the side opposite these two former buildings; in Ellen Street; the Duke of Edinburgh Masonic Lodge and the Royal Hotel in Blanche Terrace, and the Globe (Cornwall) Hotel in Ryan Street.\textsuperscript{49} There were others too, of which little is known. This may well have been because they were occupied by itinerant traders, or that the traders never became completely successful, or again, that the buildings were demolished in the path of new development.

Some of the traders, at the time, advertised regularly in the local press: J.A.T. Grummett, hairdresser and mattress maker; George Emerson, plumber, glazier, painter, paperhanger, iron and tinplate worker; George Heaney, saddler, collar and harness maker; Jno. Assheton, Prince of Wales Hotel, W. Paull and son, tailors and clothiers; J. Common, Boot and shoe maker; C. Such extraordinary success in business and building was not without its moments of tension. In October 1870 it was reported that "At Moonta dullness prevails owing to the low price for copper".\footnote{South Australian Register, 5 October 1870.} Further, in April 1874 another strike by miners threw Moonta traders into chaos. Thomas Berriman whose letter book had mostly been filled with large orders to warehousemen pleaded with one of his agents,

In consequence of the Strike I am afraid that trade will be affected very materially during the coming season... Would you feel inclined to make any concession in interest on renewals on account of the unforeseen dullness that has affected trade?\footnote{MLSA, BRG 27, Thomas Berriman to Mr. Gordon, 23 April 1874.}

Ephraim Major, who came to Moonta in 1862 and whose sons later founded Moonta's best-known coach-builders, was a grocer at the time of the strike.\footnote{For biographical information on Major see, H.T. Burgess, The Cyclopedia of South Australia, vol. II, (Adelaide, the Cyclopedia Co., 1909) p. 627.} His son later wrote that a great deal of friction developed between the miners and some of the traders,

When the business people...said they would not stand behind the men; the union decided to start a cooperative store and build a bulk store room on Blyth Terrace. Mr Prisk was appointed manager and Mr S. Cottle assistant. This business was carried on for a number of years, but it finally went out. Of course at the start it caused a commotion amongst the business people.\footnote{MLSA, D4959 (L), 'Reminiscences of E. Major (sen.) & (jnr.).' The bulk store room is now a private residence.}

Perhaps it was the upheaval that the strike caused to trade which left some traders uneasy about the future business of Moonta. Berriman makes no more entries in his letter book until he is safely ensconced in a new business at Port Adelaide in 1882, and Ephraim Major took to the vocation of a farmer, immediately following the strike. There were those amongst the commercial men of Moonta though, who felt that their lot fell in with the miners and in an attempt to settle the 1874 strike they went to Adelaide with miners' representatives and lobbied public figures, like Samuel Way, and roused public indignation against the mine company to such a degree that the miners won the day and peace returned to "Copperopolis", at least for a time.

The stability of the town and its trade was shown in a most obvious way to both townspeople and visitors alike. As Pryor pointed out by 1875 stores, like those of Charles Drew, S. And L. L. Furner, and Rossiter's hotels, like the Globe, the Prince of Wales, and the Royal; the South Australian Bank and the Gas Company's offices in Ellen Street were lit up with gas-light displays. It was the esteemed Captain Hancock who extolled the virtues of gas-light to the people of Moonta and showed the link between the town's success and a society of order and decorum, Light, he said, was absolutely necessary to the employments of mankind... He believed that the introduction of gas would tend to the increased morality of the town. Darkness fostered all kinds of evil, whereas light had an opposite influence.

A similar message, but of a different kind of light which stressed the means of Grace and the hope of Glory, was coming to the people of Moonta and the surrounding districts in 1875 from the pulpits and prayer meetings of the local churches. These churches had come from the relatively humble beginnings of meetings in wooden or pug structures to a decade of grand buildings and large congregations. In 1866 the Baptist Church, later to become the School of Mines, and its adjacent manse were built in Ellen Street, and in July 1869 the Roman Catholics laid the foundation stone of the church of St. Francis of Assisi. The Wesleyans first built a small chapel in Robert Street in 1867 and extended it in 1870. On the 25 February 1875 they opened the newly completed Gothic structure adjoining the chapel; a building of relative cathedral stature amongst the other Moonta churches. Not far east down Robert Street the other Methodist denomination in the town, the Bible Christians, built, in, 1873, a church designed by Thomas Jones in an Italianated style. The Church of England, too, was in the midst of this rebuilding programme and the new All Saints church was opened by Bishop Short on 6 September 1874.

In mid 1875, following this spate of church building, a Christian revival took place in Moonta, the likes of which were only evident in eighteenth century England or nineteenth century America - certainly no other area in Australia has witnessed the vibrancy and richness of faith which came to Moonta's people. Mrs R.S. Casely, the wife of a Wesleyan minister recalled,

The new church at Moonta was built during Mr Knight's term, the stone pulpit arrived and was erected while we were there, the cost of it was 300 pounds: In our second year a great revival took place when many were brought to the Saviour and meetings were held every evening for several weeks.

Even the Adelaide newspapers caught up with the revival and noted that at Moonta, "An impressive service was held in the public square, Mr L.L. Furner, the Mayor presiding over a meeting of 2,000 of all denominations". By July 1875 it was stated that "The increased membership of the chapels at Moonta as a result of the recent revival is estimated at 1,250".

For the following decade the people of Moonta lived in the glow of revival and a relatively successful commercial life, despite droughts and lack of water in the town, and proceeded to help found institutions for the public betterment, the erection of the school during 1877 and its opening in February 1878 being a prime example of this work. The residents and their municipal Corporation also attempted to gain a railway to Adelaide to link the colony's two most populous areas. By January 1884 the success of the municipal Corporation and the community spirit of residents saw the annual meeting of the Moonta Institute propose that a new and grander Institute should be erected on George Street opposite Roach's butcher shop. On the 8 July 1885 at a vocal, instrumental and literary concert the new Institute, which was to also house the municipal Corporation office and Council Chamber, was officially opened. The building became the central landmark of Moonta public and civil pride.

Despite the apparent progress of the town Moonta's traders had only been reminded as recently as April 1885 that the prosperity of the town depended on the mines.

Things are exceedingly dull at Moonta Mines owing to low prices for copper. If a large exodus of miners takes place a score or more of shopkeepers must follow of necessity. There are 106 places of business in Moonta not including five hotels, one billiard saloon, a flour mill and a gas works and a soap and candleworks.

The reality of the Siamese twin relationship of mine and town was a continuing factor in the commercial core's development or stagnation.

1.3 Decline, prosperity and the end of the mines (1886-1923)

The first months of 1886 did not bring good news to Moonta's inhabitants. A lull in copper prices forced the proprietors of Moonta Mines to adopt a policy of staff retrenchments.67 Within a month the Mine's news caused its usual reaction amongst Moonta traders. Large numbers of miners were reported to be leaving the district, and a newspaper account stated that at their tail, "A few Moonta businessmen have left for Silverton hoping to improve their condition".68 The recurring theme year in year out was the rise and fall of trade as copper prices fluctuated. This was more especially the case in the decade until 1892 - a decade of Australia, and world, wide depression.69

It is quite difficult to assess how the inhabitants of Moonta township felt about the ebb and flow of the town's economic life at this time; particularly with the international economy so dull. For at least one young man, Robert Vawser, a butcher, the economists ran a poor second to church and other social matters, and this may well have been the case for many other people in Moonta. In a series of letters to his future wife, Vawser never once mentioned the problems, or even the successes of trade. Rather, the letters were more concerned with the basic facts of existence. For example, he wrote that he was "Both physically and spiritually well and enjoying God's favours" and explained that even when delivering meat in the butcher's cart he discovered that "the Bible is a goldfield full of precious nuggets".70

Vawser's unwillingness to discuss economic matters with a friend may merely have been one man's way of withdrawing from the depressing facts of reality and into religious seclusion. On the other hand it may well be a pointer to the fact that despite troubles the people of Moonta were more concerned with getting on with life than being bogged down by hard times. A few months later than Vawser's letter writing the international economic situation was still depressed but Moonta inhabitants were busy preparing for Queen Victoria's Jubilee celebrations in 1887 and beginning a massive programme with the Conservator of Forests in South Australia to 'green' their town.71 By December of 1887 even Moonta traders were optimistic for in the midst of depression good news had arrived; news which again linked mines and town:

The further rise in the price of copper has strengthened hopes of local tradesmen at Moonta many of whom have been struggling along for three years hoping that things would take a turn.72

It was only five months later that these same tradesmen must have groaned when they read that "a complete collapse in the copper market is believed to be imminent".73 Yet, for all this the people of Moonta were not inactive, nor hamstrung by adversity.

For the next few years the world depression kept trade dull at Moonta. Nevertheless with their usual determination Moonta's inhabitants and the town Corporation pushed ahead with innovative ideas to better their town and to inspire self-help amongst the population. In March 1890 the town received a reticulated water supply via pipeline from the Beetaloo reservoir.74 To celebrate the arrival of a reticulated water supply after many years of water shortages the Moonta Corporation erected a drinking fountain outside the National Bank in George Street. A similar fountain was presented by J. Symons, the Mayor, and placed in front of the Town Hall. Further, in February 1891 a meeting of the committee for the Moonta School of Mines agreed to form classes and nominated teachers for a variety of subjects from mathematics, through drawing to metallurgy and mineralogy. The Government purchased the former Baptist church in Ellen Street for the School of Mines and converted it into a vibrant hall of learning. Scholars who passed through it remembered the high quality of their education for years afterwards. Further again, in November 1891 civic pride at Moonta reached a new high when the train commenced its service from Moonta to Wallaroo and displaced the horse tram.

The belief that Moonta's inhabitants and traders were 'battlers', by and large, was enhanced by the visit to the town of a reporter from the satirical Adelaide paper Quiz and Lantern. This paper was known for its celerity in damning what it saw as falseness and hypocrisy in any society it came across. It is noteworthy, therefore, that its reporters felt that, Moonta is no slouch of a place...If the price of copper had kept decently high there would have been 5,000 instead of 1,400 people in Moonta at the present day. However, copper may yet rise, and when it does look out for a rise in Moonta.

Moreover, the reporter had a chance to refer to many of the Moonta traders of the past, as well as to those in business at the time. The names of Olifent and Beaglehole are seen as synonymous with good hotel keeping, and David Buzza, Solomon Jewell, Sam. Rossiter, G.F. Wyatt, "bootmaker Chappel, Rutter, Jerry Hartley[sic]\(^{80}\) and Nicholas Bennett", are all seen as meritorious contributors to town life. The report goes on to extol the virtues of one particular shopkeeper, "Before it is forgotten... let the name of Mrs Herbert be mentioned. She has kept a lolly shop in George Street for years, and her sweeties are famous all over the Peninsula."\(^{81}\) The popularity of Moonta's lolly shops is still attested by to elderly Moonta residents.\(^{82}\) The reporter notes too, the steadfastness of the people and their holding to traditional patterns of life, "Moonta folk are firm believers in Divine worship, and they would sooner go without a meal than miss Sunday Service."\(^{83}\)

It was perhaps this clinging to traditional ways which helped. Moonta townspeople both implement new schemes of civic development and to weather the storms of economic deprivation. For at the time of the Quiz and Lantern report copper prices were low, miners' wages had fallen sharply, strikes had become more organised with the introduction of a nationally based union at the mines, and gold had been discovered in Western Australia. This last factor caused the, by now, perennial population movement from the district and the local correspondent for the Adelaide papers noted that "A number of miners are about to leave for the goldfields and others are arranging to ship teams for the transit of goods".\(^{84}\)

Despite this rather grim scene the people of Moonta had extended and beautified their parklands, had helped to construct a tram line from the town to the increasingly attractive seaside resort and shipping port at Moonta Bay - a tram line which in January 1896 carried 10,000 people in a period of 6 days - and had spent over 1,000 pounds on books for the local Institute since it was first opened in 1866. In April 1897 the townspeople joined together in a huge outdoor entertainment at Queen's Square to celebrate the Town Corporation's twenty fifth anniversary. By the following June the town and its hinterland were undergoing a thorough redevelopment and restoration. The local newspaper reported that, "Building and residence improvement is largely indulged in at the township, and suburbs, particularly in the last two years. Scores of verandahs have gone up and the buildings are generally of a permanent and substantial nature".

Although Moonta people were well able to cope with, and indeed to capitalise on, adversity, this renewed expansion of housing reflected an overall improvement in the national economy which in turn was felt at the local level when copper prices began to steadily improve. The rise in the price of copper during the early months of 1899 was soon reported by the Adelaide Press. Reports claimed that Moonta was bound for a time of prosperity:

Now however, with the satisfactory and increasing price of copper, and the marvellous improvements which have meanwhile been made in the methods of treatment the Peninsula towns, which of recent years are slowly but surely retracing their backward course, and [are] looking forward with confidence.

89 Adelaide Observer, 4 February 1899. There was a spate of Adelaide-based interest in the Yorke Peninsula mines and towns at this time. The South Australian Register on 30, 31 January and 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7 February 1899 published descriptive articles on the Peninsula, and the Adelaide Observer brought out a special illustrated supplement which was advertised on 28 February 1899.
The town itself was described in glowing terms as being:

A compact town, with well-laid-out streets, neat often handsome residences, and substantial and large places of business. Inside the four boundaries reside 2,000 people ... In 1895 there were many houses to let, but at present it would be almost impossible to find a dwelling unoccupied. 90

The article goes on at some length to extol the virtues of the townspeople's persistent faith in the town and their pride in its outward appearance.

Continuing down Blanche Terrace to George and Ryan Streets - the two principal thoroughfares - one looks along two streets of shops, many of them two stories high, broken here and there by even more imposing buildings, and ending with tidy houses, which cover all the available ground until the eastern terrace is reached. The business people have had great faith in the place. They have erected shops substantial and large, and in the three main roads - George Street, through which the tram passes, and Ryan Street and Ellen Street - connecting the two - are to be found many buildings which would be a credit to larger centres of population... The public buildings are distinctly in advance of nearly all the other South Australian towns... The Corporation of Moonta has ever been progressive... The people believe in beautifying their town and homes... Beside this, in 1887, a Treeplanting Committee...was formed... It is supported by subscriptions, and the work done is transforming the whole appearance of the town. 91

As rewarding as this description is, the reporter's final comments cut to the heart of Moonta's town life. "The trade is not booming, but it is more prosperous than it has been for years past..." Of course the mine means nearly everything". 92

90 Adelaide Observer, 4 February 1899.
Just as in the first decade and a half of Moonta township's life when the business and building grew apace as the mines flourished so during the years after the turn of the twentieth century the new found prosperity of the mines was reflected in town growth. In 1901 the Salvation Army opened a new Barracks on Ellen Street, in March 1903 the Duke of Edinburgh Lodge enlarged their reception and banqueting rooms, and by September 1904 the Corporation had installed new acetylene lamps for street lighting (previously they were lit by gas company mains from the Moonta Gas Company). In 1906 another Adelaide newspaper reporter was able to say of the town,

The view and general briskness of business, style of the shops, charming designs of the houses and cottages, the beautiful avenues of trees all meet the eye at one quick glance, and form both a pleasing appearance, and a surety that the visit will be well repaid and never regretted.\(^\text{94}\)

The same article spoke of the fine footpaths and well laid out parks in the town and gave photographs and summaries of some of the town businesses. J.J. Rickard, chemist; E. Major, blacksmith; Empire Cycle Co.; Mr John Snell, timber merchant; W. Cowling, draper, ironmonger & etc.; J. Nilson, tailor; H. Williams & Co., tailors; Globe Hotel; and W.C. Rowe, draper and clothier; all advertised their trades. All these businesses - in the typical mode of advertising jargon common to all eras - were said to be first in their field, or "the finest and most up-to-date, or better than Adelaide's equivalent, or, as a sign of the times of intense xenophobic nationalism, employers of "'white' labour, of course...[at] a 'white' wage" who would not stock "coloured labour goods".\(^\text{95}\) Yet, it remained for William Cowling of Blanche Terrace to crow the loudest about his store and its contents,

The building is now a handsome one; in fact, one of the best in town. The different departments are heavily stocked with every conceivable article a first-class shop of the kind should have... The funeral arrangements carried out under Mr Cowling's supervision have always given entire satisfaction... Probably the prettiest house and best-kept garden in Moonta is that of Mr. Cowling's.96

As business prospered and told of its achievements the civic life of the town progressed as well. In May 1907 the Moonta Institute, which doubled as Corporate offices, gained the clock tower it had lacked. Further, in April 1909 the new, and very spacious, Railway Station was completed.97 In the same year H.T. Burgess', Cyclopedia of South Australia outlined a picture of Moonta as a productive and innovative town. The town, he wrote,

Presents a striking appearance to the visitor as he approaches by train... There is some advantage in the comparative limitation of ground available for building purposes, in as much as a certain air of compactness has followed, the space being more fully occupied and the edifices less scattered than is often the case in rural townships. The well-paved streets and equally well-kept footpaths run between places of business equal in style to those of any other town. The architecture of the Methodist and some other churches justifies the term imposing. The Court House and other public buildings, the Institute and the provision for friendly societies, the public schools and other establishments are all on a superior scale...
In many respects the condition of Moonta reflects credit on its civic management.98

96 Ibid, p.27.
97 Yorke Peninsula Advertiser 17 May 1907, 9 April 1909.
98 H.T. Burgess, op cit p.622.
One could level the criticism that all of Burgess' volumes are laudatory in character and seldom, if ever, criticise. His work, indeed the spirit of the age, endeavoured to build up a national pride for a young federation of states. His introduction puts it thus,

The capabilities and resources of the country are fairly well understood - so well, at least, as to encourage faith in their possibilities, kindle hope, and stimulate energy. Material interests of all kind are enjoying an era of prosperity.99

Yet, most importantly, Burgess' material which made up the portions on towns in the Cyclopedia of South Australia, was gleaned from the officials of local Corporations and councils.100 The above description, therefore, was how the representative of the townspeople of Moonta viewed his own township. An age of prosperity and optimism had reached Moonta.

Civic pride reached a high when in 1913 the Corporation started to enact decrees to educate the public into the manners suitable for this age of prosperity. Fifteen signs were erected in the streets of Moonta bearing on one side the inscription 'DO NOT SPIT ON THE FOOTPATH', and on the reverse side, 'KEEP TO THE RIGHT'.101 This ordered optimism was even carried through the years of the First World War, a number of traders like Emerson and Davey, and Crutchett, modernising shop-fronts with plate glass windows, and the Savings Bank of South Australia building new premises.102

The overall social atmosphere of the town was buoyant as well. On Friday nights, and especially on Christmas Eve,103 - a very special night in the social life of Moonta - the streets were full of people. Mr George Warren remembered that "You know the people in the streets those days...by 9 o'clock you could hardly walk for the crowd of people".104 Mr. Lester Ford, too, recalled that "the street shopping area of Moonta was absolutely crowded".105 The crowds, especially the men, sang as they looked over the shops or strolled up and down the footpaths and streets. Both Mrs Ruby Barnes, and Mrs Winn Eden said that the music rang through Moonta. Mrs Eden stated, "What I remember mostly was how the boys liked to sing. Wherever there was a party of young lads they would get together and sing...that's very vivid in my mind".106

However, the music and buoyant atmosphere of the town were to cease when on 1 November 1923 it was announced that the Wallaroo and Moonta Mining Company was to be voluntarily wound up. Within a week clearing sales were being held at the mines to sell off surplus equipment.107 As a later writer said, "it was a great blow to Moonta".108 The origin and life-force of the town which had controlled the township's affairs for sixty years was suddenly extinguished. The result was immediate. Oswald Pryor later deemed it to be "the black day in the history of Wallaroo and Moonta".109 For the last time the rise and fall of the world copper market had played out its impact at Moonta.

1.4 Agriculture and tourism (1924 - present)

By 1926 the town of Moonta had only 1,350 residents, and the majority of the miners had gone off to Adelaide to work at Holden's motor body building works or were employed on the Bowmans to Moonta railway broadening the gauge. The advertisements of traders now stressed their ability to cater for tourists in a modern manner. Tasker's Moonta Hotel claimed, Excellent accommodation for the travelling public. All conveniences, garage and wireless receiver, sporting men particularly well catered for. All interstate beer and lagers stocked.

Without a large mining population to support them Moonta traders were seeking to gain other sources of trade.

The following year saw Moonta's Corporation and townspeople launch a season of historical nostalgia and remembrance in an effort to bring back some of the district's lost souls, even if only momentarily. One journalist claimed that "Moonta is one of the most recent victims of the 'Back to' - infection - a complaint common to many country towns in these days". A lavishly produced pamphlet on Moonta's past was hawked around emphasising the importance of mining to the town. However, commentators on the event realised that the mines were a thing of the past and concentrated on the community's new, and less spectacular, economic base.

Moonta still holds its place on the map as a centre of an important agricultural district, and withal a community that still bears the stamp of its historic importance in its well planned and cleanly kept streets, and handsome and capacious public buildings.

At times too, even the official pamphlet admitted the rising importance of agriculture and featured a series of photographs on the wheat industry, subtitling it hopefully, "agricultural possibilities of the district". The pamphlet further stressed the town's closeness to Adelaide for the tourist. There was a daily passenger service on the railway, a weekly boat service as well for those doing the 'Gulf Tour', and "The run by motor car...is 100 miles the roads being fairly good". Agriculture and tourism had become, overnight, the basis of the town's economy.

The years to follow were hard on the people and traders of Moonta. Business in the 1930s, even after the Depression, was described as being "at a fairly low ebb". The town had a rather insular, but of course friendly, atmosphere about it. Mr Bert Giesecke, one of the town's butchers remembered, "In those days I could walk up the street; if there was one stranger in town I'd know." Tourists came, sometimes by the bus, boat and train loads, but the town seemed to have a type of time-capsule around it which only reflected the glory of the past. Bond's Motor Tours which ran scenic tours to many parts of South Australia had Moonta on one of its itineraries. The handbook they produced for the journey described nearly all of Moonta's activities in the past tense; a sign of the town, in a sense, living off its past as one of Australia's richest and most famous mining areas. For example, the handbook states, "For years Moonta was a prosperous town. It however experienced the vicissitudes incidental to mining centres."

With the coming of the Second World War the town regained a little prominence as a huge wheat handling centre, however, the population never really grew again. After the war, it was as Mr

Lester Ford said a town, "where half the shops were closed". Some of those closed shops - irreplaceable parts of the heritage of the first boom in town building - were demolished in the 1950s and 1960s.

In the last decade though, due to the increased popularity of the nearby beach resorts and the increased mobility of tourists, the town has seen a great resurgence of trade. Vacant shops have been filled and once again the variety and diversity of trade in Moonta is on the increase. Now, though, it would appear that the town has become a resort and agricultural hinterland service centre. The mining service centre of the past is now over 60 years dead. However, the town is part of a new nexus; the nexus of tourism industry, rather than the international copper market.

2.0 HERITAGE STRUCTURE AND DEVELOPMENT

2.1 Development Pattern

Discussion in this section is concerned with distinctive phases of settlement and development, and the relevance of such patterns are illustrated in Map 5.

1860 - 1863

The first phase of development 1860-1863 was probably centred, in the main, on George Street. Although there are local claims that commercial development was initiated in Ryan Street, due to the perpetual flow of salt water from the mines down George Street, and only spread to George Street in later years there would not seem to be any firm information on which to base this hypothesis. The river of salt water was, of course, a reality but is recorded as taking place six years after the foundation of settlement, and the consultant has been unable to find any previous mention of the subject to any great degree. In fact, the river in George Street was used as 121 Oral Interview, Jane and Rob Linn with Mr J. Harbison and Mr P. Ferguson, Moonta, 4 December 1985. O. Pryor, op cit supports this claim in his book p.153, but gives a "by 1870" date which is hard to support when the town was surveyed some seven years earlier on a "Colonel Light" design grid plan. If the town's model was based on Adelaide, then George Street, as the main street, would have taken the place of King William Street in the original Adelaide survey. Another view put forward on George Street was the connecting street for the road carrying pedestrian and vehicular traffic from the Mines. Comment, Mr Ralph Hazel, January 1986, and based on a report in the Yorke Peninsula Advertiser 15 December 1893, which refers to the anticipated construction of a "new military road". Whatever the reason, George Street became the main commercial area within a decade of survey and settlement. Mr. Harbison's hypothesis has a firm basis and comes from a report in the South Australian Register, 13 February 1869 which records the minor river running down George Street. However, the same report states "A Corporation if formed would stop that nuisance in a day".

lever by those who wished to gain a local Corporation; it was cited as an example that if there was a local municipality this type of occurrence would not occur in the main street.\textsuperscript{123} Rather, it would appear that the first shops in the towns were spread through both Ryan and George Streets. At this present time, however, the only buildings known to have dated from 1863, the year in which the land sales at Moonta took place are the Moonta Hotel, the former Prince of Wales Hotel (now Stocks' Antique & Bric-a-brac), former Roach's butcher shop (now Waters'), and former Henry Martin's shop. All these buildings are in George Street.

Moreover, the site for the town of Moonta was hurriedly selected by Surveyor General Goyder in early 1863 under Government pressure to install a Government rather than a private town and then, it would seem, just as hurriedly surveyed in March 1863.\textsuperscript{124} The chosen survey plan for the town was that best known to South Australians and was based on Light's basic design for Adelaide, with its broad streets centred around a square. This made the square and adjoining streets a central part of the plan. However, as in the case of Adelaide, it was more developers who decided that evolution of commercial areas, and although George Street was the logical street for commerce, being adjacent to the Square, development occurred along it spasmodically.\textsuperscript{125} Nonetheless it was George Street which figured prominently as the major thoroughfare, with Ryan Street, an important, but secondary development and on a less intensive scale.

The buildings represented in the first phase are of relatively simple scale and style. All are single storey, designed in a box-like fashion and constructed of either random rubble walling,\textsuperscript{123} \textsuperscript{124} \textsuperscript{125}

\textsuperscript{124} See footnote 8.
\textsuperscript{125} See footnote 45 and 46. In 1869 Berriman claimed that not only were vacant shops being filled, but also new ones being built in the commercial core "to the number of 8 or 9". These shops were either replacing more vernacular structures or, which seems more likely, they were a sign that core development was only just taking off after 6 years.
or rubble walling - coursed - with rendered quoins and surrounds to openings. Verandahs were probably added later to the hotels; early photographs show them without the appendage.¹²⁶

The second phase of development from 1864 - 1885 was one of a more disparate and diverse fashion spreading along all the streets within the study brief. This phase took on a variety of characteristics; social/educational [houses, schools, lodges], commercial, ecclesiastical, governmental and municipal.

This again, was particularly evident in George Street, but in this period a variety of private commercial and government buildings were erected along Ellen and Ryan Streets as well. In Ryan Street some light industries, like Blacksmiths, also developed, but these and more were also a part of the George Street, streetscape.

Some of the buildings were designed on a relatively grand scale for a South Australian country town - for example, the churches, fourth Institute, National Bank and Union Bank - while some reflected the prosperity of this period - see for example the number of two storey shops and hotels in George, Ellen and Ryan Streets - while some again, showed the use of unusual building materials or design techniques - see for example Marshall's buildings in George Street and the Duke of Edinburgh Lodge on Blanche Terrace.

- Social/educational

A number of social/educational items of both local and State importance developed, both in the Commercial Core, and on its parklands periphery.¹²⁷ From an educational point of view the Area School (state 1), the former Anglican School (State 19), the third Institute (State 30) and the fourth Institute (State 33) are of vital interest. There are also a number of lodge buildings which are important to the town's heritage. Most notably number 11, the Duke of Edinburgh Lodge (State 6), is of great interest being the State's longest continuous lodge in the same building. Of the houses within the Commercial Core which attracts immediate attention map numbers Local 14 and 16 in Ryan Street both gain importance from their links with Moonta trading identities. Ryan Street contains a number of houses with strong heritage links and these should be carefully noted. It is Robert Street though which, at this time, best represents the type of residential housing of heritage value from this period. Map numbers Local 37 to 42 show this distribution.

- Commercial

Moonta's richest distribution of heritage items of a commercial nature are contained within this period. Two main centres on Ellen Street, between George and Ryan Streets, and on George Street itself, between Blanche Terrace and Henry Street, contain the main holdings of heritage items. Sections of George Street, however, have had more modern development which has greatly disrupted the overall flow of the heritage streetscape. Nonetheless, George Street, Ellen Street and to a lesser extent, Ryan Street and Blanche Terrace, provide an abundance of items of State and local significance. Refer to map and inventory sheet numbers. Of these items, some are of outstanding significance as either individual or streetscape items, or both.

- Ecclesiastical

The churches of Moonta that date from this period are vital to an understanding of the historical progression of the townspeople and therefore, the town's heritage.

Governmental and Municipal

Inventory and map item numbers State 18 and 33 and Local 44 are most important to this part of the town's heritage. The post office and the town hall are outstanding examples of public buildings and are recognised landmarks in the town.

Queen Square, and the fountain that Charles Drew donated which it contains, was originally the central portion of the townscape. In this period a dedicated group of townspeople planted out a type of mini-botanical garden in this square, with walks and seats, for those who wished to contemplate the natural world. Over time the originally well organised tree plantings aged and lost their original purpose. The initial idea though was a most important factor in giving the townspeople a central physical focus.

Moonta prided itself on the quality of its civic works; many of which are of importance to the town's streetscapes. The care of its streets, immaculate footpaths and kerbings, the large-scale treeplanting exercises, the provision of water fountains in the main street on the coming of a reticulated water supply, and the pride in Queen Square with its variety of trees, garden walks, resting places and beautiful timber fence, were, and are, always being noticed by visitors. The heritage found in such street and civic "furniture", and other public services like the provision of "mine-stone" water tables, is one not restricted to this particular period, but spans Moonta's European history.

This is the last of the periods within the heritage study of relevance to particular buildings included in the inventory of recommended heritage items and its accompanying map. In all, 4 items are included in this period, numbers State 1 and 28 and Local 1 and 7. The two State recommended items, the former railway station and State Bank show highly individual design and construction techniques.

2.2 The Physical Heritage - Construction and Colourings

Construction

One of the tasks of the consultants was to ascertain elements of the physical heritage of Moonta township. From a design and construction point of view this task was made simpler by the generosity of the District Council of Northern Yorke Peninsula in their supplying through the local branch of the National Trust several hundred photographs of the town and its buildings. A selection of these, which the consultants feel best elucidate the physical nature of town buildings and streetscapes, is included in 2.3.

As well, the consultants concluded a series of oral history interviews with elderly Moonta citizens between the ages of mid 70s to early 90s, and also conducted interviews with knowledgeable members of the local branch of the National Trust.133

133 Oral interviews, Jane and Rob Linn with Mrs Beryl Ferguson, Mrs Ruby Barnes, Mrs Winn Eden, 21 November 1985; Mr Lester Ford, Mr George Warren, Mrs Mary Ferguson, Mr Jim Harbison, Mr Peter Ferguson, 4 December 1985; Mr Bert Giesecke, Mr and Mrs L.A. 'Snow' Johnson, 5 December 1985.
Colourings

- Verandahs

The study of nineteenth century photographs of Moonta, both from the National Trust and in the collections of the Mortlock Library of South Australia, clearly showed that many traders and residents had striped verandahs. Verandahs, as such in the town, were mostly part of a building phenomenon which occurred between the 1870s and 1900, and were usually of a concave design, although bull-nosed design were occasionally in evidence.

The informants clearly remembered that striped verandahs were of a basic colour make-up. The main colour components were red-brown/ochre and cream/light brown-beige, the underside of verandahs were usually painted light blue or light green.

- Buildings

The informants remembered that on the whole building colour schemes were of a rather drab appearance mainly using browns and greens. Mr Jim Harbison recalled having seen old paint colours called 'light', 'mid' and 'dark' stone that were very popular c.1900. It was he also who recalled that chocolate and cream colours were often used, with grey being a predominant colour for shop shutters. Some individual traders had 'business' colours; butchers being white and blue and barbers being red, white and blue stripes. There was only one shop in Moonta, 'Bennett's' which was all white in colour. It was also remembered that some buildings, particularly hotels, had a kickboard - of black along the base of the stonework. It was seriously suggested that the utility of this black strip was in the camouflaging of the frequent assaults of urinating dogs.

2.3 Photographic Documentation

An extensive collection of supportive photographs are contained in Appendix A. The material is from a collection of the National Trust of South Australia, Moonta Branch: the numbers refer to the National Trust, Moonta Branch, file.
2.4 Conclusions

An inventory of proposed heritage items is presented in the form of individual item identification sheets for items considered to be of State significance (Appendix B). It is considered that with further research items of local significance, particularly some of the shops in George Street, may attain State importance as key indicators of how retail trade grew in a boom period in a mining town.

Two tables have been compiled which list proposed State Heritage and Local Heritage Items respectively. The lists are accompanied by maps 8 and 9 which show the location of individual items. This information is presented in Section seven as a component of the Supplementary Development Plan whereby the items may be considered in concert with development control policy and thus ultimately attain legal status. It is further proposed that a portion of the Study Area is designated as a State Heritage Area. This is primarily based upon the concentration of items of State Heritage significance which the designated area embodies, and a comparison with other towns studied in regional heritage surveys. These aspects are also expanded upon in Section seven.

ITEM IDENTIFICATION SHEET

ITEM NAME: Area School

Description: Constructed of coursed rubble masonry with brick quoin, of a symmetrical thin U-shape design with ornate carved gabling rising from the ends of the 'U' and from 2 central abutments to the main door.

Historical Summary: The school was built under a Contract let in November 1876 to the firm of Rossiter and Davies (this firm later constructed the Moonta Mines School). At one stage, because of an acute water shortage, the construction was stopped. It began, originally, as a model school and continues to function as the local area school.

Heritage Significance: Highly significant because of the link with the Moonta Mines School. It shows the development of education within a mining service community. Aesthetically, it is of note and it is also a local landmark.

Former or other

Description: Constructed of rough rubble walling in variable courses with rendered quoins. A simple, yet beautiful design in two storeys with a rectangular moulded parapet. An upper storey balcony of timber and c.g.i. is a late nineteenth century addition.

Historical Summary: This hotel was first licensed to H. Lester in 1865, then B. Ope in 1866 and W. Beaglehole from 1867-73. Beaglehole was later manager of the Lion Brewery, North Adelaide. In 1896 sample rooms were added to cater for travelling salesmen and their wares. In 1928 renovations took place enlarging the dining room.

Heritage Significance: A fine example of mid-nineteenth century hotel architecture which also shows the added significance of sample rooms - a guide to the expansion of business enterprise from Adelaide to the country. A key feature in the town and an important reminder of tourist prosperity and the strength of the mines.

ITEM NAME: Former Cowling's House and store complex

Description: A two-storey shop with a single storey house to one side. The house is constructed of coursed rubble wailing with ornate rendered quoins and surrounds to openings. The shop is constructed of coursed rubble, but with an upper storey facade of brick. Shopfronts date from late 19th to early 20th centuries.

Historical Summary: This shop and house complex was built by William Cowling, a mayor of Moonta 1902-3 and 1907, and son of Captain Thomas Cowling of the Wheal Hughes and Yelta Mines at Moonta. The store, house, and its garden, became famous throughout Moonta. Cowling claimed that his shop was 'heavily stocked with every conceivable article a first class shop of the kind should have'. It dates from the 1870s as can best be ascertained at this time.

Heritage Significance: A fine example of a late 19th century two storeyed shop and dwelling. At one time the complex was the talk of all Moonta and was claimed to be the most modern and efficient store in town. It highlights just how the prosperity of the shopkeepers ran in line with the mining successes. Further, it is the most prominent old store on Blanche Tce.

| ITEM NAME: | Roman Catholic Church, St. Francis of Assisi Former or other |

Description: Constructed of coursed rubble walling in a rectangular design, the church has had buttressing added to give it a more European feel. There is also some moulding work on the Blanche Ice facade. The design incorporates simple elements of church architecture and features three lancet windows with an upper patterned surround, on its Blanche Ice facade.

Historical Summary: The Roman Catholic Church was first represented in the district by a Jesuit mission from Sevenhills from 1861-1865. The foundation stone of this church was laid in July 1869 at a ceremony attended by 2,000 people. It was opened on 12 December 1869.

Heritage Significance: The structure is an important statement of the part the Roman Catholic Church played in an overwhelmingly Methodist area. The structure too, shows a significant use of local building materials within its European design tradition. An important part of the State's religious heritage.

Description: Although a basic rectangular, box-like structure constructed of ashlar stone walling with ornate moulded quoin and surrounds to openings, the building has a highly individual character. The mouldings on the main facade-classical scrolls and lodge symbols-and the battlement design on the anteroom, give a unique prospect to the structure.

Historical Summary: This Lodge was established in 1869 and held its first meetings in the Royal Hotel and later at the Bible Christian schoolroom. The building was constructed in 1875, and is noted throughout the masonic fraternity for the scroll work in gold leaf and other decorations on the interior walls which were done during renovations in 1899. The anteroom was added in 1903.

Heritage Significance: The oldest masonic hall, outside the Adelaide area, this is of vital significance to the State. Locally, it represents the strong tendency towards Lodges in the 19th century.

ITEM NAME: Anglican Church, Former or other 'All Saints'

Description: Designed in an early English style and constructed of random rubble walling with an interior hammer and beam roof. The external addition of unsophisticated buttressing is a dominate design element.

Historical Summary: The first Anglican services were held in a now demolished church on Rym St. in 1866. The foundation stone of this building was laid by the then Governor, Anthony Musgrave on 11 September 1873. The church was opened for worship on 6 September 1874 and consecrated 10 years later. The stained glass windows and the bell (cast in 1874 at Moonta Mines) add to the building's historical character.

Heritage Significance: A most important symbol of the influence of religion at Moonta and the town's relative prosperity during its first phase of settlement. It is important both to the town and the State architecturally and for its use of local material. It is an integral part of the township's heritage.

ITEM NAME: Former School of Mines

Description: Constructed of random stone walling around an unusual twin-sectioned design which reflects part of the building's origins as a chapel. The mouldings and rendered surrounds to quoins and openings are of robust design. The main facade reflects this strong feel with its symmetrical openings and pediments.

Historical Summary: In 1891 the School of Mines began its existence at Moonta, taking over the former Baptist chapel built in 1866. The School of Mines was the first established outside the metropolitan area. The furnace room was built in 1896 and further building enlargements were made in 1903. The first classes at the School were in metallurgy, mineralogy, chemistry, mathematics, assaying and drawing.

Heritage Significance: A site of national importance reflecting Australia's pride in educational and mining pursuits. An obvious reminder of the international fame which Moonta attracted during its boom years.

ITEM NAME: Former Union Bank
Former or other

Description: Constructed of ashlar walling with rendered quoins, and moulded surrounds to doors and openings. A two-storeyed design with an ornate parapet. The design incorporates 5 openings per storey, with semi-circular heads, on the main facade, and these give a solid overall appearance.

Historical Summary: Built c.1873 as the new office for the Bank of South Australia, which first opened its Moonta branch in George Street, c.1864-65. In 1892, as part of the rationalisation of Australian banking, the Union Bank took over the building and ran a branch there until 1943.

Heritage Significance: A most unique building of unusual design. The opulent design reflects the success of the mining and commercial heart of the district in the 1870s.

Description: Constructed of random limestone rubble walling with brick quoins and surrounds to openings and rectangular brick parapet with some mouldings. A double-fronted shop, with a timber and c.g.i. verandah attached to main facade.

Historical Summary: Built c. 1870s the shop housed one of the variety of service industries, professional and trades - insurance agents, solicitors, auction marts, chemists, carpenters, saddlers, merchants, bakers and bootmakers - which were integral to the commercial structure of Ellen St., and Moonta, in the last decades of the 19th. century.

Heritage Significance: An excellent example of the relative prosperity of Moonta in the early 1870s, and the diversity of trades that flourished. This shop, with its well preserved form, is an integral part of the Ellen St. heritage streetscape which is a most significant one in the Moonta Commercial Core.

Description: This building, on a corner position, is constructed of coursed stone walling, with rendered surrounds to quoins and openings. It is of a rectangular design with a thin parapet, with central ornamental relief on the Ryan St. facade. It has a timber and e.g.i. verandah attached.

Historical Summary: This building was first constructed in 1866 and opened as Moonta's telegraph office in October of that year. It was built by T.R. Heath of Wallaroo. In 1909 a bull-nosed verandah was added and in 1913 alterations were made and two rooms added.

Heritage Significance: One of Moonta's earliest public buildings and an important part of the Ellen St. heritage streetscape. The building is a fitting reminder of how quickly Moonta gained importance in Government eyes after its foundation in 1863.

REFERENCES J.R. Harbison, 'Moonta's buildings and places of interest' (unpublished typescript ms 1960); National Trust Notes: Register 21 November 1865, 11 October 1866.

Some moulded parapet work on main facade.

Historical Summary: The first All Saints Anglican Church was consecrated on 23 July 1865. This building followed in 1866 as the church's schoolroom. It was sold to the Druids in 1902 when a new parish hall was built.

Heritage Significance: A pointer to the early involvement of the established church at Moonta and also to the type of buildings which housed Moonta's early educational institutions. Of significance too, because of Moonta society's respect for education in the 19th century.

ITEM NAME: Cornwall Hotel
Former or other Globe Hotel

Description: A two-storeyed L-shaped building constructed of random limestone rubble masonry with rendered quoins and surrounds to openings. The second storey has a bullnosed verandah over 2/3 of the main facades, with some wooden scroll work abutting timber posts. Openings are positioned at random throughout the facade design.

Historical Summary: The hotel was first licensed 1865-67 to W. Square, then from 1869-75 to Jerry Hartigan. In 1885 a large fire extensively damaged the building. In 1910 a narrow balcony was removed and replaced with the present one of footpath width.

Heritage Significance: One of the series of fine hotels in Moonta which clearly speak to the town's colony-wide importance in the late 19th century. The hotel is also an example, with its sale room, of how commercial travellers chose to sell in provincial towns. An excellent building and part of the Ellen St. heritage streetscape.

Description: A superb example of a mid-Victorian shop design constructed of limestone rubble walling with brick quoins and surrounds to openings; the quoins are inset with rubble. The main facade features a timber and glass panelled front (probably original) placed on either side of a double door. A concave timber and e.g.i. verandah is attached to the main facade.

Historical Summary: One of the most famous names amongst Moonta traders was that of Beaglehole, one of whom, John, built this store. J. Beaglehole Snr. ran a business as cornfactor, seedsmen and ironmonger. The business ran successfully until the early 20th century.

William Beaglehole, a brother, eventually ran the Lion Brewery at North Adelaide. John Snr. was a Moonta Councillor from 1891-93.

Heritage Significance: A truly fine example of a colonial shop in near original condition. Its proximity to the Ellen St. heritage streetscape heightens its importance. Its connection with a prominent South Australian commercial family is also of note.

ITEM IDENTIFICATION SHEET

ITEM NAME: 'Marshall's Buildings'
Former or other

Description: A fine two-storeyed shop constructed of coursed stone walling on main facade and random rubble on others, and brick quoins and surrounds to openings. A timber and c.g.i. verandah is attached to main facade. What are probably original timber and glass shop front panels remain. The stone used in the main facade is from Moonta Mines.

Historical Summary: Built in 1873 by S.D. Marshall of Port Wallaroo, who was also involved in Ellen St. development at this time. The Yorke Peninsula Advertiser records that S.D. Marshall was building 4 'commodious' 2 storied shops, probably the building here, and, later 5 substantial 2 storied shops in Ellen St.

Heritage Significance: Apart from the building's intrinsic value to the George St. heritage streetscape and the overall commercial history of Moonta, it has value through the use of such unusual stone in the construction of the main facade. The building is a significant remnant of the late 1860s, early 1870s trade boom at Moonta and speaks to the 19th century commercial enterprise spirit.

Description: A two-storeyed shop constructed of limestone rubble walling with rendered, shaped, quoins and moulded surrounds to openings. The main facade has concave timber and c.g.l. verandahs on both storeys and is adorned by a quite ornate parapet. What appear to be original timber and glass panelled shopfronts remain.

Historical Summary: Built in the early 1870s boom period of Moonta commercial life and occupied for many years by E.A. Beythein one of Moonta's first chemists. Chas. Bowering purchased the shop in 1911 and ran a boot and shoe shop there for many years.

Heritage Significance: An outstanding shop in the George St. commercial zone which speaks volumes to Moonta's 19th century prowess as a wealthy mining centre. Its connection with Beythein, a famous local figure, gives it note too. It is an integral part of the George St. heritage streetscape.

Former or other

Description: A two-storeyed bank building constructed of limestone rubble walling with rendered moulded quoins and surrounds to openings. The ground storey shows semi-circular heads to windows and doors and the main door has raised, rendered surrounds.

Historical Summary: The National Bank first opened a Moonta Branch in 1866, a Bank officer buying allotments 136 and half 135 at £450. In March 1867 at a cost of £2751 for building, the Bank opened its doors.

Heritage Significance: A fine example of the importance with which large banking houses viewed Moonta's prosperity. A large, imposing building with unique elements of design and construction which are an integral part of the George St. heritage streetscape.

Description: A two-storeyed design of coursed Tertiary stone rubbing on main facade, and brick on other walls, with brick quoins and moulded surrounds to upper storey windows; these windows have semi-circular heads. There is some ornate work on the parapet. The ground floor has a timber, brass and glass shopfront of note.

Historical Summary: This building was erected in 1865 for C.N. Birks, chemist. By 1878 C.N. & W.H. Birks were described as chemist and storekeepers with shops at Kadina, Wallaroo and Moonta, and as booksellers at 60 Rundle St., Adelaide. Heritage Significance: A most important item in George St.'s heritage streetscape, with a well-preserved shopfront. The building's connection with the influential Birks' family gives it heightened importance to South Australian history.

ITEM NAME: Former Prince of Wales Hotel

Description: Constructed of random limestone rubble walling in a box-like shape with rendered surrounds to doors and openings. Main door still has impressive semi-circular head. One section of main facade has timber and e.g.i. verandah, with corner lace work attached.

Historical Summary: Built and opened for business under licence to Mr. Weeks in 1863 this hotel has a history full of local legend and fact. The Moonta Corporation held its first meeting there and also the cemetery trust, the I.O.O.F. Manchester Unity Lodge, and the Moonta Football Club. Cockfighting was a commonplace sport held at the rear yard of the hotel.

Heritage Significance: One of the few survivors from the first year of the Moonta township and an important location for local meetings and gatherings. Of great significance in assessing town growth in South Australia and the development of building styles in the hotel service trade.

ITEM NAME: Giesecke's Butchers
Former or other Thomas' Grocery Store

Description: A single-storey shop constructed of limestone rubble walling with moulded surrounds to doors and openings. Part of the building incorporates shops with timber and glass panel fronts intact. The building is on a corner position and a concave timber and e.g. verandah runs around this frontage.

Historical Summary: According to late 19th century photographs this building was first occupied by J. Thomas, grocer, in 1864. In 1917 the Savings Bank of South Australia rented it for a branch office. The property was purchased by Giesecke in the 1920s for a butcher's shop. Albert Giesecke came from the Burra to Moonta in 1882 and began trade on Ryan St. The family still run the business.

Heritage Significance: A most important corner site, the meeting point of the Ellen and George Sts. heritage streetscapes. The building's early date for the town, and its connection with well known local traders are important. It is a vital position in the town's heritage.

ITEM NAME: State Bank

Description: Single storey building of rectangular form with a rising, peaked, wall and roof line above main entrance. Quoins, windows and door surrounds are fancy mouldings with door sporting two columns plus classical line motifs. The roof line above the door supports two 'needles' as ornamentation.

Historical Summary: A Moonta branch office of the Savings Bank of South Australia opened in March 1912 in rented premises on the corner of George and Ellen Streets. The first manager was H.R. Hopkins. The site for this building was bought in May 1916 and the building designed by architects F.W. Danker & Sons, Adelaide. It was opened on 28 May 1917.

Heritage Significance: A unique piece of early 20th century architecture which incorporated Moonta Bay beach stone on the main facade and local limestone on other walls. Its proximity to many of Moonta's earlier buildings, and its own individual character make it of importance to the George St. heritage streetscape.

ITEM NAME: L.H. Loller Former or other Bank of South Australia

Description: A simple box-design building constructed of random limestone rubble walling with raised stone surrounds to quoins and openings. The main entrance door is overshadowed by a solid entrance porch surrounded by semi-circular arches.

Historical Summary: Built c. 1864 for the Bank of South Australia, it was the first bank in the Moonta township. The branch moved to the massive Ellen St. building in the 1870s. There are claims that the building may have been designed by Sir George Strickland Kingston, mainly because of the entrance porch design, and designs to other openings. J.R. Corpe was a well-known manager of the bank.

Heritage Significance: A most important item which shows the movement of banking into rich investment areas - a good comment on mid 19th century economic history in South Australia. The building has enormous value too, if the claims about Kingston being its architect are true. An integral part of the George St. heritage streetscape.

Former or other

Description: A building of rectangular design constructed of random limestone rubble walling. Quoins are faced stone. A central semi-circular headlight window with ornate moulded surrounds is centred in the main façade. Doorways were placed symmetrically around it. Much of the external moulding design on main façade is classically inspired.

Historical Summary: The third Institute building was opened in March 1870 on land donated by David Bower M.P. The building was designed by Mr. Rossiter. By July of that year 70-80 members were attending functions. The hall closed in 1885 on the opening of the Town Hall building and was sold to the Friendly Societies who used it until the 1950s.

Heritage Significance: A fine indicator of the importance of working men's education in South Australian life. The building itself has fine design characteristics. It is a most important part of Moonta's boom life of the 1870s.

Description: The church is constructed of random limestone rubble with brick quoins and surrounds to openings. It is designed in Lombardic style with a large double central door on main facade, a window either side, surmounted by triple light windows.

Historical Summary: The hall and manse may well predate the main former church building which was constructed in 1873. There was seating for nearly 400. It was designed by Thomas Jones and built by Nettle and Thorn and Rossiter and Davies. Sir Samuel Way laid the foundation stone on 22 September 1873.

Heritage Significance: A magnificent building and a clear indication of Methodism's impact on the Cornish community at Moonta. Moonta was renowned for its Methodist tradition and was the home of Australia's only 19th century religious revival on a large scale. Of singular importance.

Historical Summary: The station was completed in April 1909 by J.A. Gambling as part of an upgrading of facilities on the Moonta line. Its construction signified the increased importance of Moonta as one of South Australia’s copper centres and, also, a relative stability in copper prices at the time.

Heritage Significance: A reflector of the pattern of transportation in South Australia, and only one of three stations of this type in the State - the others at Penola and Wallaroo. Moreover, the station serves as a local landmark in the Mines/Township area.
